Year 12
embarked

on a trip to the Emirates stadium, London, to attend a university fair. While the journey there may have been long, it was well worth the wait. Once we arrived we were overwhelmed with a wealth of variety and choice in terms of university stands to go to. A huge range of universities from Greenwich to Southampton were ready and waiting to answer any questions students had about universities specifically and in general. I personally visited more than 10 of these stalls, all of which were polite and surprisingly very honest with me. If they believed their university didn't supply the required equipment or was simply not offering the course at the same quality level as another university, they told me straight away. This was a general theme that ran through the entire day, honesty and telling students how it is. This was somewhat refreshing from the sugar coating most university websites make about their own courses to entice enrolment. It was nice to know who really was offering me the best value for the course. Furthermore the day was littered with talks about finance and more. This further helped clarify what university life was like and how it is more affordable than most people think! All in all the day may have been long but was well worth the visit, even if the stadium was for a terrible football team!
